ACADEMIC COSTUME AND REGALIA

Academic robes are visible representations of a tradition that comes down to us from the first European universities of the Middle Ages. Because universities were founded and operated by the Church, students were required to wear the prescribed clerical gowns at all times. Present American academic costumes were adapted directly from those of the oldest English universities, Oxford and Cambridge, with Cambridge predominating.

The usual color for American academic dress is black although increasingly robes in the school's predominant color may appear, particularly for holders of doctorates. The bachelor's robe is worn closed and has long, pointed sleeves. The master's robe is worn open, and the forearms protrude through slits in the elbows of the sleeves. The doctor's robe is worn open or closed and has three velvet bars on each sleeve.

The most colorful part of the costume is the elaborate hood, once a head covering. The doctor's hood is larger than the master's. Hoods are lined with the colors of the university or college from which the wearer received the degree. The trimming or collar of the hood is of a color that designates the discipline: blue for philosophy, brown for fine arts, orange for engineering, pink for music, white for liberal arts, buff for business, yellow for science, light blue for education, etc.

Caps are usually black and of "mortarboard" design, but modern usage permits the omission of the cap's stiff liner, giving it softer contours. Tassels for doctorates are gold while those for other degrees are most often black. Switching the tassel from the right side to the left signifies that the degree has been conferred.

The regalia one sees in the academic procession today are a reminder that higher education has long and cherished traditions, of which today's graduates become a valued part. These successful degree holders of a young but growing institution have earned their opportunity to contribute to those traditions, and they remind us that in an enlightened citizenry rests the strength of a democratic nation.
